Does God really exist? This is the thought that probably occurred in everyone's mind. Atheists fervently deny that God is living today. But when thinking back on how the universe and humans existed, the Atheists will have to confess that there is a God. However, thanks to beliefs like evolution, Atheists will claim that the universe and humans came to existence from the processes of evolution. Mankind came from animals, animals came from materials, and materials came from certain chemical substances. That is where they stop. Then where did the original substance come from? No one has yet given an answer, because they know they can't! Comparing all the facts anyone can think, it will always come down to the fact that the most logical point is that God exists. You may not see Him personally, but there are also many things that people did not see personally (the Big Bang, Abraham Lincoln, an atom, etc.), yet they believe they exist. Here are two main problems that Atheists will use against a Christian in order to disprove God's existence:

Atheist Problem #1: How do you know God really exists?

1)   Isaiah 44:6: We believe God exists because of what created the universe. If it wasn't God who created the universe, then what did? If you say some substance (whether it be the two meteors crashed from the Big Bang, or some gas and liquid in space, or etc.) created the universe, then what created that substance? If you say some other substance created it, then what created that other substance? The list would go on and on, but no matter how far back we go, the only answers you can think is: (1) the original substance had no beginning, which contradicts the Second Law of Thermodynamics, (2) nothing created it, which contradicts the First Law of Thermodynamics, or (3) some extremely all-powerful Being created everything. It makes more sense to believe that some extremely all-powerful Being created everything.

Atheist Argument: But then what created God? It does not make sense that God has no beginning.

Christian Answer 1: It does not even make more sense (actually more un-logical) that a substance had no beginning. If it wasn't God who created the universe, then what did? No matter how far back we go, the only answers you can think what created the universe is: (1) the original substance had no beginning, which contradicts the Second Law of Thermodynamics, (2) nothing created it, which contradicts the First Law of Thermodynamics, or (3) an extremely all-powerful Being created everything. It is more un-logical to believe that substance had no beginning than some extremely all-powerful Being had no beginning.

Christian Answer 2: If there is someone who made God, then there must be also a "someone" who made that "someone" who made God. The list would go on and on indefinitely. But no matter how far back we go, there must still be some extremely all-powerful Being that created everything.

Atheist Problem #2: But you never saw God before, so how can you believe there is a God?

1)   Psalms 19:1: On the same way, you never saw the Big Bang or the beginning stage of Evolution before, so how come you believe it? From simply thinking what created the universe proves there has to be some extremely all-powerful Being who created the universe. No matter how far back we go, the only answers you can think what created the universe is: (1) the original substance had no beginning, which contradicts the Second Law of Thermodynamics, (2) nothing created it, which contradicts the First Law of Thermodynamics, or (3) an extremely all-powerful Being created everything. It makes more sense to believe that an extremely all-powerful Being created everything.

2)   Romans 1:19-22: You never saw the designer making that watch you are wearing. You never saw the designer constructing that home you are living. You never saw the designer building that car you are driving. So does it make sense that you can believe in a designer creating those simple objects and deny in a Designer creating the complex universe? Common sense shows there must be a Designer creating the universe!
